

Is English the language of business?

Nearly a quarter of the world speaks English.

With roughly 2 billion speakers worldwide, English is now the de facto language of business. While historical and political factors have clearly impacted the spread of the English language across the globe, it's also true that English-language learning is a major organisational value-add.

For starters, equipping your workforce with language learning tools helps them develop critical speaking and listening skills at work and in their personal lives as they live, work, and travel abroad.

Plus, many global organisations use English language learning as an essential component of their global DE&I strategies. By giving everyone in your organisation access to critical English language learning tools—regardless of physical location and mother language—you are equipping them to grow in their careers while giving everyone a voice in your business.

The global English-speaking landscape by the numbers.

English has become the language for business because it's in high demand for businesses and individuals internationally.

Here are some eye-catching statistics on the matter:

- Research from the 21st Century Education Research Institute revealed that roughly 70% of Chinese parents in Beijing want their children to speak English.
- English is the dominant language of more than 60 countries.
- English is the only language attracting more than 1.5 billion speakers worldwide.
- Leading global organisations rely on English to conduct business worldwide. This includes household names like Honda, Nokia, Nissan, Airbus, and more.

Why should your employees learn English?

English-language learning has skyrocketed in popularity because it is critical for international business growth and communication. In 2019, the global English-language learning market generated roughly $8.8 Billion in revenue.¹

Employees entering the global workforce want to ensure that they can adapt to an ever-expanding global marketplace and adapt to new, challenging roles no matter where they go in the world.
